The Lee Monument at Lexington. If the character of a people may be truly estimated by the reputations of the men honored and immortalized by them, then the people of Virginia are fortunate indeed. The long list of illustrious worthies in civil life to whom they have always delighted to do honor would suffice to render notable any State or nation the world has ever known. But when to these are added the names of Virginia's heroes in war she is indeed glorified. No nobler ever adorned the history of a country than those of WASHINGTON, LEE, and JACKSON.

These three names are closely connected with the town of Lexington, where yesterday thousands of people assembled to do honor to the memory of one of them. The incomparable Washington, the unequalled LEE, the unapproachable Jackson. "These three, but the greatest of these" was we dare not say. We know not. Let it suffice that the one whose monument was yesterday surrounded by admiring multitudes was the matchless commander of matchless armies. We suppose we may say, in imitation of what was said of SAUL and DAVID, that WASH-INGTON commanded his tens of thousands, but LEE his hundreds of thousands. Whether WASHINGTON could have handled successfully such bodies of men. we shall never know; but whilst we may JACKSON, and uttered in all sincerity by LEE. Great men, indeed, were these, as well as great Generals.

The Republican State Convention of Iowa did its work on Wednesday last. The very first words uttered in the body showed what was uppermost in every man's mind. Hon. John A. Colonel D. B. Henderson, the permanent chairman, pledged the Republican party to "the home" as against "the saloon."

The candidates for Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and supreme judge, were normated by acclamation—a remarkable fact in 128,000 colored men we are also willing to nated by acclamation—a remarkable fact in a State in which nomination by the Republican party has long been equivalent to election.
